this is an analysis of the sociological and economic causes of the demise of certain traditions such as the glowing rich phulkaris of the punjab also discussed are women embroiderers working in traditions that are centuries old but new to the marketplace and urban lifestyles the book provides a moving account of the rites of passage of rabari women who empowered through their embroidery have become their own designers and entrepreneurs it shows through color photographs and text how craft has not only been a catalyst for personal growth and social and economic change but has also created new conflicts and challenges women who worked to their own rhythms and creative impulses now craft to tunes others play cultural influences from the outside world have infiltrated their aesthetic and homes the articles included describe textiles and skills still used by people for themselves rather than the courtly textiles of yesteryear while india is poised between past and future craft still maintains its place

Two Taproots

marguerite thoburn watkins memoir two taproots growing up in the forties in india and america begins as the usa enters world war ii and her missionary family the thoburns is evacuated from india to america it covers the next ten years of the author s life three peripatetic years in new england with their wartime scrap drives rationing and victory gardens culminated in a precipitous return to india while the war was still on the departure was secret because loose lips sink ships she is back in india for indian independence the partition riots and the assassination of gandhi but the story is primarily personal family friends boarding school life experiences and impressions of growing up in two worlds it is about formative years shaped by world war ii the last days of the british raj indian independence and by missionary life the author was a professor s kid on an indian college campus and an american girl at boarding school in the himalayas nourished as she says by english khana and hindustani gana by a rich stew of cultures and religions and by the natural beauty of her homes she describes herself as having two taproots india and america but she was also part of a third experience that was nourished by both countries a third culture kid she conveys the privilege and challenge of such a life discovering as do many expatriate children that her country of citizenship seemed sometimes more foreign than the land in which she was born and that she is both at home and a stranger in either world the author s great love for india is apparent as a writer she says i can put myself back into a picture and am surrounded by the sounds smells people names i thought i had forgotten like shifting color chips in a kaleidoscope forgotten patterns regroup and are mine again for a moment the ongoing struggle for self rule was a feature of her landscape in both jabalpur and mussoorie obstacle after obstacle marches arrests when independence finally arrived it came with a joyous rush but it came with partition and the bloody partition rioting the author writes suddenly we too were involved and the landour muslims were in harm s way one particular night toward the end of august students heard shouts and screams from the hillside across the valley a sobering experience partition rioting had started in mussoorie standing on the balcony in the afternoons looking toward the landour bazaar girls watched the rioting far across the valley we had a panoramic view of the mullingar army headquarters on the ridge and below it the settlement of muslim homes we observed ant like figures climb toward the safety of the mullingar enclosure to our horror columns of smoke rose from burning homes the flames from one large house lit the sky yet there was an eerie unreality to the scene it was all so far away we could see the destruction but it was too far to hear very much and too we now had no news from the outside world and little sense of how widespread and bloodthirsty the riots had become finally it was time for the author to sail back to america to attend bates college in maine it was the end of her childhood the memoir closes as a new decade begins new years day 1950 it was the start of her next incarnation life at home in her country of citizenship i snuggled in longing for my cat and looked out the window at the snow and stars in a few hours it would be new year s day 1950 i wondered what the new decade would bring me and i thought about my two lives the unknown one ahead in this home country that was not really home where i felt like an outsider and the one behind me in the country i loved where i really was an outsider but did not feel like one i had friends at college and family here who loved me but did not understand me i thought about
