grazing by wild and domestic mammals can have small to large effects on plant communities depending on characteristics of the particular community and of the type and intensity of grazing the broad objective of this report was to extensively review literature on the effects of grazing on 25 plant communities of the southwestern u s in terms of plant species composition aboveground primary productivity and root and soil attributes livestock grazing management and grazing systems are assessed as are effects of small and large native mammals and feral species when data are available emphasis is placed on the evolutionary history of grazing and productivity of the particular communities as determinants of response after reviewing available studies for each community type we compare changes in species composition with grazing among community types comparisons are also made between southwestern communities with a relatively short history of grazing and communities of the adjacent great plains with a long evolutionary history of grazing evidence for grazing as a factor in shifts from grasslands to shrublands is considered an appendix outlines a new community classification system which is followed in describing grazing impacts in prior sections this bureau of mines report presents results of a detailed study of water usage in the wyoming mineral industry along with projection for the future in 1964 the mineral industries of wyoming used 20 billion gallons of new water nearly all self supplied and reused 72 billion gallons a total usage of 92 billion gallons consumption amounted to 2 8 billion gallons about one half of the billion gallons of new water was obtained from surface sources and the rest from ground water reported costs covering power and maintenance for the self supplied new water at mineral industry operations ranged from less than 1 cent to 20 cents per thousand gallons and averaged 8 cents at one mineral related operation water was hauled by truck to supplement a well supply the cost was 2 00 per thousand gallons delivered however the supplemental requirement was only 10 gpm cost figures for the recirculation of water covering power and maintenance averaged 2 cents in terms of water usage the value of product for the entire industry was 25 per thousand gallons of new water intake and about 180 per thousand gallons consumed the study revealed that wyoming has a water deficiency but that the shortage is less severe than in the arid southwest projection of the water needs of the wyoming mineral industries indicates that the demand for new water will increase from the 20 billion gallons used in 1964 to 25 billion gallons in 1980 a 25 percent increase the projected new water requirement for the year 2000 is 40 billion gallons a 100 percent increase compared with the 1964 figure
