uniting into a compact array of states with interests that were hostile to the north on the point most vitally affecting the welfare of the whole country no great question involving the existence of slavery was brought before the attention of congress during van buren s term of office nor was the matter mooted except in the eternal wrangles over receiving the abolitionist petitions benton kept silent in these discussions although voting to receive the petitions as he grew older he continually grew wiser and better able to do good legislative work on all subjects but he was not yet able to realize that the slavery question was one which could not be kept down and which was bound to force itself into the sphere of national politics he still insisted that it was only dragged before congress by a few fanatics at the north and that in the south it was made the instrument by which designing and unscrupulous men wished to break up the federal republic his devotion to the union ever with him the chief and overmastering thought made him regard with horror and aversion any man at the north or at the south t who brought forward a question so fraught with peril to its continuance he kept trying to delude himself into the belief that the discussion and the danger would alike gradually die away and the former state of peaceful harmony between the sections and freedom from disunion
