Social and Economic Foundations of the Italian Renaissance 1969 this book examines the societies of the civilised world old and new and its two distinct and separate classes whilst one class accumulates in utter idleness enormous and ever increasing revenues the other far more numerous labours life long for miserable wages one class lives without working the other works without living or without a life worthwhile when confronted by such a contrast the question must at once occur to every mind is this sad state of affairs the result of inherent necessity inseparable from the organic conditions of human nature or is it merely the outcome of certain historical tendencies that are destined to disappear at a later stage of social evolution it concludes that the truth is to be found in the latter alternative that capitalistic property with its caste division of humanity into capitalists and labourers is by no means the product of conditions inherent in human nature but simply the result of powerful historical causes which will eventually disappear a variety of facts are presented in support of this argument human well being relies critically on ecosystem services provided by nature examples include water and air quality regulation nutrient cycling and decomposition plant pollination and flood control all of which are dependent on biodiversity they are predominantly public goods with limited or no markets and do not command any price in the conventional economic system so their loss is often not detected and continues unaddressed and unabated this in turn not only impacts human well being but also seriously undermines the sustainability of the economic system it is against this background that teeb the economics of ecosystems and biodiversity project was set up in 2007 and led by the united nations environment programme to provide a comprehensive global assessment of economic aspects of these issues this book written by a team of international experts represents the scientific state of the art providing a comprehensive assessment of the fundamental ecological and economic principles of measuring and valuing ecosystem services and biodiversity and showing how these can be mainstreamed into public policies this volume and subsequent teeb outputs will provide the authoritative knowledge and guidance to drive forward the biodiversity conservation agenda for the next decade this book presents a new economic theory developed from physical and biological principles it explains how technology social systems and economic values are intimately related to resources many people have recognized that mainstream neoclassical economic theories are not consistent with physical laws and often not consistent with empirical patterns but most feel that economic activities are too complex to be described by a simple and coherent mathematical theory while social systems are indeed complex all life systems including social systems satisfy two principles first all systems need to extract resources from the external environment to compensate for their consumption second for a system to be viable the amount of resource extraction has to be no less than the level of consumption from these two principles we derive a quantitative theory of major factors in economic activities such as fixed cost variable cost discount rate uncertainty and duration the mathematical theory enables us to systematically measure the effectiveness of different policies and institutional structures at varying levels of resource abundance and cost the theory presented in this book shows that there do not exist universally optimal policies or institutional structures instead the impacts of different policies or social structures have to be measured within the context of existing levels of resource abundance as the physical costs of extracting resources rise steadily many policy assumptions adopted in mainstream economic
