Bureau of Radiological Health Publications Subject Index 1979 presents results of a study of the effects of cultural and environmental factors on the survival growth and development of white spruce and lodgepole pine crop trees deciduous competing vegetation and herbaceous competing vegetation the data were collected during the summers of 1992 and 1993 from 28 research microsite projects in alberta controlled factors included type of mechanical site preparation microsite planting position planting stock type and planting date response variables include various measures of crop tree survival final size and rate of growth deciduous tree competitors and shrub forb and grass competition analytical methods used include contingency table analyses multivariate analyses of variance multiple linear regression analyses and a variety of exploratory graphic methods the results indicate the influence of microsite position stock type and planting season on the performance of crop trees and competing vegetation
